Burberry
Heading a historic house such as Burberry, Daniel Lee who has been at the Brit fashion forefront now for the third season, his goal is to democratize Burberry, "Evangelize from loyalty to the streets" he said to Vogue. His nice ensemble of a classic thiny shirt with shorts stemming from his second outing for Burberry rather fits more or less the "street", Bond street of course.

Christina Seewald
 Hailing from Vienna, this label known for their handcrafted knitwear pieces has been on the younger generation of fashion people's radar. For quite some time. Dodging empty buzzwords like slow fashion and sustainability, this contemporary knitwear label sees itself discussing topics of gender equality and fragility more through their craft instead of words.

Valentino
 Nobody embodies the journey towards a new masculinity in fashion better than the designer for the house of Valentino himself. When Pier Paolo Piccioli first took over, he used to take his bow in his bespoke Roman tailored suits. But over the years, the suits have been replaced with loose fitting jeans and T-shirts. This laid-back look is also very much at the core of his men's collections now. Yes, there is tailoring in pure cottons and drill weaves, but the jackets are worn with shorts as seen here on model Kajally.

LV
 Pharrell Williams' stint at Louis Vuitton, one of the biggest fashion houses to ever exist, began with this collection. Taking over Paris' Pont Neuf last June to present his S/S 2024 men's wear collection, this appointment is a testament that fashion is not just about clothes anymore nor the craftsmanship behind them. It is about culture.

Emporio Armani

Mr. Armani has been in the brand story telling game all along. He brought Nobu to Milan, opened a flower and chocolate shop, he has been heavily involved in football culture and dressing football players from the beginning, huge beauty licensing deals with L'Oréal, a nightclub and hotel in Dubai and of course his Armani/Silos which he has turned into a contemporary photography museum. This man does not seem to rest.
